Three Day Colloquium on Case Studies

May 1-3, 2019

Colloquium

One of the key skills that business school education strives to impart to its tutelage is the skill to make decisions. While there are courses that impart domain-specific knowledge and theoretical concepts on decision making, the case study pedagogy aims to build the decision making skills. For more than a century, business schools across the world have used this method extensively and it continues to remain a significant teaching tool.

The colloquium for three days is a unique blend of conference and workshops. This colloquium aims to assist academicians to teach and also develop their own case studies. Effective usage of case studies is tied to the teaching objectives of the case study. However in practice, there are possibilities of variations owing to different audiences and learning competencies. Hence the facilitator of the case study discussion might require customizing teaching and discussion plans.

Additionally, the colloquium would also aim to assist academicians attempting to develop their own case studies. This is through presentations of case studies and teaching plans developed by participating delegates and workshop sessions. An eminent panel consisting of experienced case writers will offer their feedback to fine tune the case study.

Target Audience

- Academicians teaching business management courses interested to learn the case study pedagogy
- Academicians interested to develop their own case studies
- Academicians/case study authors who have developed case studies and interested to seek further feedback and publishing opportunity.
